ThatªAãAã always the challenge with airlines announcing lofty goals ªAãAã fleets cameªAãt be updated overnight. UnitedªAãAã sleek new domestic interiorsCan United compete with DeltaªAãAã service culture? The things that United is investing in are totally worthwhile, but to me thereªAãAã one thing preventing United from being in DeltaªAãAã league ªAãAã thatªAãAã the general culture at the airline, including the employees. Individually United has some great employees, just as American does. But I believe these employees are great because theyªAãAã good people who choose to live their lives in a positive way, rather than because of anything that United instills in them. What United doesnªAãt have is the consistent customer focus youªAãAãll find at Delta. Are all Delta employees amazing? No, of course not. But when you fly Delta thereªAãAã a general sense among employees that they appreciate and value their customers, much more so than youªAãAãll find on American and United. If united found a way to do this, it would be a force to be considered, but it is not a small task either. coincidentally I am writing this from a united flight in economy plus (my American flight was delayed for hours and I had to rebook). the 737 is quite nice and has tvs in each place, but still has not been a great experience. I think that this is representative of the typical united experience: at the check-in counter of the premier access (I'm star alliance gold) two employees were talking and did not offer to help, even if they saw us I thanked the agent of the gate while I embarked on the aircraft, and she said nothingWi-Fi was broken by the first half of the flight I went to the bathroom after takeoff, and when I came back, the flight attendant The TVs are nice, good service is more pleasant line uniteds is making some improvements that customers will love - the airline spent the last few years improving their international premium cabin experience, and now the airline is focused on improving the experience for everyone else. This includes ordering new planes, and more importantly, installing a product that people will enjoy. with the direction in which united is going, the carrier is definitely more in the Delta league, and leaving the American behind. The big question is if United can take with Delta's Delta's TVs and mood ill illuminations are pleasant, but friendly employees who seem to like their jobs and value their customers even more pleasant. What do you think - United can improve the service to the point that it really compete with Delta from the point of view of passenger experience, or is what we are now seeing the extension?
